

Open Call for a Designated Lecturer at Nagoya University's Institute for Advanced Research

Nagoya University's Institute for Advanced Research (IAR) was established in 2002 in accordance with the University's Academic Charter ahead of similar entities administered by other universities. The IAR has been designed to proceed with internationally recognized research activities of the highest caliber, to generate distinguished research achievements, and to contribute to society through such commitments. The IAR's main missions are as follows:

- (1) To introduce and share excellent research with members of the University from the perspective of an academy within the University, thereby promoting academic research;
- (2) To promote joint and interdisciplinary research with world-leading researchers;
- (3) To foster young, independent researchers who can serve as trailblazers in their respective academic fields from an interdisciplinary viewpoint; and
- (4) To promote further academic interaction with general research universities around the world through activities as a member of the University-based Institutes for Advanced Study (UBIAS) and contribute to globalization of the University's research.

To fulfill the missions above, the IAR would like to make the following open call for a Designated Lecturer who will be in charge of practical measures in the field of science and engineering. Please note that if applicants are judged as being on the same level in terms of their credentials (including research and educational achievements, social contribution and character), the University will give preference to women.
